

Photosynthesis is the process by which green plants use sunlight to make food. It takes place in the chloroplasts, which contain the pigment chlorophyll. Carbon dioxide and water are turned into glucose, releasing oxygen.

The light-dependent reactions happen in the thylakoid membranes of the chloroplast.
The Calvin cycle then fixes carbon dioxide in the stroma to build sugars.
Both stages are needed for the plant to store energy as chemical bonds.